

Public Art

Most cities have fountains, statues, murals, and other works of art for everyone to enjoy. Some people even think that graffiti is a form of art. While spray painting on the side of a subway train is destructive, city planners might hire an artist to use the same kind of bright colors and bold designs to brighten the wall of a playground or the fence around a construction site. Many times a group of artists will ask permission to put a work of art in a public place. This usually makes the city more enjoyable. But sometimes the people of a city don't like the work of art and want it taken down!

An artist has been hired to paint a fun mural next to a playground. Do you think the maze will end up at the person who likes the mural, or the person who doesn't like it?
